

Maria Hassabi unveils PREMIERE at the Kitchen

Maria Hassabi talks about her new work, PREMIERE, which is a co-production by the Kitchen and Performa 12.

BY JENNIFER STUSSMAN

PHOTOGRAPH BY JEFFREY M. COHEN

Maria Hassabi (left) with Biba Bell, Hiroko Hatake, Robert Rizzo and Andree Zito-Brown

Photo: Jeffrey M. Cohen

Maria Hassabi talks about her new work PREMIERE, which she will perform at the Kitchen, alongside Biba Bell, Hiroko Hatake, Robert Rizzo and Andree Zito-Brown. The work is a co-production by the Kitchen and Performa 12.

What constitutes a premier? How is it more expansive than merely the first time a curtain is raised on a new show? In the aptly titled PREMIERE, choreographer Maria Hassabi explores the idea of an anticipated event; for her, a dancer is never truly born until she audience is present. In the evening-long work—the latest in her series of slow-moving pieces that crystallize and celebrate the complexities of live performance—she highlights four stellar performers, along with Hassabi herself (Biba Bell, Hiroko Hatake, Robert Rizzo and Andree Zito-Brown). PREMIERE is a co-production by The Kitchen and Performa.

Time Out New York What were your ideas for PREMIERE?

Maria Hassabi I don't know if you've noticed from my past work, but I've been playing with those titles. It's always like a hybrid: piano or show; what is a show? Premier. "What is a premier?" So I was in my own understanding of the terms and going in hand with the values that I believe in. When I look into the word premier, more than anything, away from this highly anticipated event and all of these things—it is really the moment that a work of art is realized. I work in the studio for a long time. Friends can come over and watch it, but it's only when a premiere happens that it's really a work of art. Not because it's better, but the moment that it validates itself. So that's what I'm playing with the name and that was my intent. Then I had this desire to work with these people, without thinking, they all live in different countries, their schedules are crazy—everybody's so busy and full, Biba, Bibi, and how am I going to do this? But I wanted to deliberately mirror my life—I'm never in one place I split because living in Europe and New York, which is very difficult to sustain any continuity in life. It was a crazy idea, but it's mirroring my life. [Laughs.]

Time Out New York How do you cope with that distance? Do you have all over the place?

Maria Hassabi This team is kind of like that. We have two more residents altogether, but for a show usually, in terms of New York preparation, you work the last few months intensely with everybody, which is not the case with PREMIERE. I work intensely with one person, intensely with another person.

Time Out New York Why did you choose each performer?

Maria Hassabi Andree [Andree Zito-Brown] is a New Yorker that moved to Brussels ten years ago. She beautiful, beautiful, beautiful. I knew of Bibi and saw him when he was still in New York, but I really met him when I started working with Jimmy [Rizzo] in 2011. Jimmy is a visual artist, and they're friends. Andree was the one who recommended me to Jimmy. Then I saw him perform a few times. The performance that really moved me was a show that he did with this artist [from] last year at MOCA [Milano]. There are all these performers in the spot, and somehow he came very close to me and the way he moves. I was so touched. He didn't make me feel like his performance and I am the audience his approach was so integrated in a very natural way. I wanted to bring Bibi back into my work, because I love him, and we've spent so much time working with Robert and Maria the last three years, that he's been family to me. While going again to do a big show—like a big show with more than two or three people—I wanted to keep this quality that he brings when I'm with him and where we're making together. It's more grounding.

Time Out New York How does the duet start?

Maria Hassabi Because he's grounded. Not only as a performer, but as a person as well. [Laughs.] And then Hiroko. [Smiles.] I can never imagine making work without her. Unless she's pregnant.

Time Out New York There is such a strong bond. But Robert too. In your work, you are making dances, but also deep, deep connections with people.

Maria Hassabi I have good bonds, because I feel that way. [Laughs] Biba [Bell]. Biba worked with me on The Ladies, and I really loved that. She came in the process very late, she was not at our first residency at [Brussels] Kursaalco in June. It was supposed to be Paige [Mastis] originally. Paige was like, "I have someone to recommend to you, I would go for Biba." And she was actually the person I had in mind for the piece I made in February this summer. I had asked Paige and Biba, and then I couldn't afford it, so I dropped Biba, because Paige was already gonna be in PREMIERE. Then when Paige could not do PREMIERE anymore and had to cancel coming with us to the residency last minute and all of these things, I asked Biba. She joined us in February last.

Time Out New York When did you first notice Biba as a performer who could fit into your very specific world?

Maria Hassabi The funny thing, I think it was when we were shooting The Ladies, actually. The Ladies is this piece where they walk around the city. We would rehearse it here. I haven't really seen her perform. I was away for Walter Dandurand's work, and I heard that she was amazing in that. I've been missing a lot of the New York shows, you know? When we were doing The Ladies, it was still very specific what I was asking from the people I was working with, and the way she approached it, I was of course taking her eyes from her. And I had told Hiroko already from then on, "Wow, this girl, I want her to be with us." But I didn't know where.

Time Out New York When you were working with the dancers individually, did you give them specific tasks?

Maria Hassabi They did have specific tasks at the very beginning, which is similar to how I explore movement—usually, it's really silly. Lying down. Kneeling. Standing up. Walking, but then when we were in Brussels—I don't know if you know this, but always in my work, I end up finding a specific task that we end up exploring. That's the hardest part in my process is to find that, what is the task for this work. So we do have some tasks. We're going again to do a big show—like a big show with more than two or three people—I wanted to keep this quality that he brings when I'm with him and where we're making together. It's more grounding.

Time Out New York How long have you been living in this body?

Maria Hassabi I can't tell you. [Laughs] It's very simple, but I can't.

Time Out New York What have past tasks been in your work?

Maria Hassabi For the piece I just did for the Winter Residencies this summer, the task was completely related to the solo. It was called Interactions—again playing with these words—and also the space. I decided to do the whole work on chairs. So it happened in a huge gymnasium. When I went there in February to set the piece, right away I decided I was going to do the whole work on the chairs. They're much bigger chairs than we have at the Kitchen. So the task was inherent in everything. I was going to make going down the stairs and across going up the stairs. With SHOFIC [with Hiroko], it was about this distance but we would never touch at the same time, we're touching all the time. Because we do know we're going to have the people around us, the idea of SHOFIC is that it needs the audience, otherwise there's no show. So it was about exaggerating that idea. And the distance that I tried to keep between us, that we tried to keep between us, was the distance I wanted with the people. And at the same time, the two-dimensionality, so you get to see us all the time. So there's no underlining.

Time Out New York Do you share the tasks?

Maria Hassabi No. With Robert and Maria, it's looking at each other in the eyes. With Sophie, it was the copying of all these images that I found of female women, and how you transfer from one image to the next within the physicality of motion, muscles, bones. And it goes further and further. It's easier when there are groups. Like with the happy piece. Or with the piece that I did with Jimmy in February I already knew that I was going to work with his material.

Time Out New York What was that?

Maria Hassabi The work was Counter-weight, and it consists of a specific number of wooden planks of different sizes. A three-minute Super 8 film is a set. So I had these three different elements to work with. And Jimmy, it becomes his self when it is. It's enough of a limitation.

Time Out New York Do you have goals in this new piece?

Maria Hassabi No.

Time Out New York Are you changing the space around in the Kitchen?

Maria Hassabi No. I can't talk about that. [Laughs] But it is back in the theater, because for me PREMIERE is a theatrical experience, as you're sitting. Originally, I wanted to keep this distance of the audience that we made with SHOFIC, but then I let go of this idea when I started working. The Kitchen is the smallest theater we are going to perform this in. I'm adding the really big stages. It happened like this just because the first residency was at Kursaalco, which is a much bigger space, so right away I started setting it there. Now this one is really made for the Kitchen, and then I'll have to adapt it for the next one.

Time Out New York When did you first notice Biba as a performer who could fit into your very specific world?

Maria Hassabi What I like to do with each performer is to really choreograph and direct every part, every note that they're making. There, there are all the notes that come in performance that you cannot control—there's always. Sensing movements in space. The motions that happen in the studio and those that happen in front of the audience are very different. And that's my love with doing solo, alone works like no one even though I take care of every detail, there is still so much movement that comes with the dancer, the dancer, the room—that only happens in front of the audience. It's movement that's beyond my choreography, beyond any direction. So as you go to see, I want and need to direct them in a very specific way. I want everything to be taken care of. Also, that helps the performer to stay involved in the work. If they know exactly where their fingers are going, for example, it keeps them very contained to what they're doing and very busy in the moment. I want to find a task that keeps us present within the moment. That's the idea of the tasks. Now, how much time do I have to go into each detail, which is my love of making work—making those details. It's not with everybody that I'm going to be able to do that. Maybe I will. I don't know. As of now, I'm like, You have to maybe let go. I've learned this process the way it is.

Time Out New York Do you have to work so hard with Robert and Hiroko, whom you've collaborated with before?

Maria Hassabi I do. That's the way I understand. People think it's audience. To me, it's trying to understand what it is we're doing. It's language for me. So I don't want to be telling everything in words. I always tell them lots like speaking—we chose our words carefully and then we speak them out with clear articulation.

Time Out New York But it's parameterizes you—the spaces.

Maria Hassabi No. And I can't wait to be heard clearly. It's not going, "Huh," like, "Huh, how are you?" And then it's like, "How are you?" It takes a little bit of time to put the color in there. And with this idea of working with each one of them, you put it together, and it doesn't really work with the pronunciation we found. So I'm not sure how close I'm going to get in what I dream of, of my work for this work. Just we do have some close. Which going again to do a big show—like a big show with more than two or three people—I wanted to keep this quality that he brings when I'm with him and when we're making together. It's more grounding.

Time Out New York How does the duet start?

Maria Hassabi I can't tell you. [Laughs] It's very simple, but I can't.

Time Out New York What have past tasks been in your work?

Maria Hassabi For the piece I just did for the Winter Residencies this summer, the task was completely related to the solo. It was called Interactions—again playing with these words—and also the space. I decided to do the whole work on chairs. So it happened in a huge gymnasium. When I went there in February to set the piece, right away I decided I was going to do the whole work on the chairs. They're much bigger chairs than we have at the Kitchen. So the task was inherent in everything. I was going to make going down the stairs and across going up the stairs. With SHOFIC [with Hiroko], it was about this distance but we would never touch at the same time, we're touching all the time. Because we do know we're going to have the people around us, the idea of SHOFIC is that it needs the audience, otherwise there's no show. So it was about exaggerating that idea. And the distance that I tried to keep between us, that we tried to keep between us, was the distance I wanted with the people. And at the same time, the two-dimensionality, so you get to see us all the time. So there's no underlining.

Time Out New York Do you share the tasks?

Maria Hassabi No. With Robert and Maria, it's looking at each other in the eyes. With Sophie, it was the copying of all these images that I found of female women, and how you transfer from one image to the next within the physicality of motion, muscles, bones. And it goes further and further. It's easier when there are groups. Like with the happy piece. Or with the piece that I did with Jimmy in February I already knew that I was going to work with his material.

Time Out New York What was that?

Maria Hassabi The work was Counter-weight, and it consists of a specific number of wooden planks of different sizes. A three-minute Super 8 film is a set. So I had these three different elements to work with. And Jimmy, it becomes his self when it is. It's enough of a limitation.

Time Out New York Do you have goals in this new piece?

Maria Hassabi No.

Time Out New York Are you changing the space around in the Kitchen?

Maria Hassabi No. I can't talk about that. [Laughs] But it is back in the theater, because for me PREMIERE is a theatrical experience, as you're sitting. Originally, I wanted to keep this distance of the audience that we made with SHOFIC, but then I let go of this idea when I started working. The Kitchen is the smallest theater we are going to perform this in. I'm adding the really big stages. It happened like this just because the first residency was at Kursaalco, which is a much bigger space, so right away I started setting it there. Now this one is really made for the Kitchen, and then I'll have to adapt it for the next one.

Time Out New York When did you first notice Biba as a performer who could fit into your very specific world?

Maria Hassabi What I like to do with each performer is to really choreograph and direct every part, every note that they're making. There, there are all the notes that come in performance that you cannot control—there's always. Sensing movements in space. The motions that happen in the studio and those that happen in front of the audience are very different. And that's my love with doing solo, alone works like no one even though I take care of every detail, the dancer, the room—that only happens in front of the audience. It's movement that's beyond my choreography, beyond any direction. So as you go to see, I want and need to direct them in a very specific way. I want everything to be taken care of. Also, that helps the performer to stay involved in the work. If they know exactly where their fingers are going, for example, it keeps them very contained to what they're doing and very busy in the moment. I want to find a task that keeps us present within the moment. That's the idea of the tasks. Now, how much time do I have to go into each detail, which is my love of making work—making those details. It's not with everybody that I'm going to be able to do that. Maybe I will. I don't know. As of now, I'm like, You have to maybe let go. I've learned this process the way it is.

Time Out New York Do you have to work so hard with Robert and Hiroko, whom you've collaborated with before?

Maria Hassabi I do. That's the way I understand. People think it's audience. To me, it's trying to understand what it is we're doing. It's language for me. So I don't want to be telling everything in words. I always tell them lots like speaking—we chose our words carefully and then we speak them out with clear articulation.

Time Out New York But it's parameterizes you—the spaces.

Maria Hassabi No. And I can't wait to be heard clearly. It's not going, "Huh," like, "Huh, how are you?" And then it's like, "How are you?" It takes a little bit of time to put the color in there. And with this idea of working with each one of them, you put it together, and it doesn't really work with the pronunciation we found. So I'm not sure how close I'm going to get in what I dream of, of my work for this work. Just we do have some close. Which going again to do a big show—like a big show with more than two or three people—I wanted to keep this quality that he brings when I'm with him and when we're making together. It's more grounding.

Time Out New York How does the duet start?

Maria Hassabi I can't tell you. [Laughs] It's very simple, but I can't.

Time Out New York What have past tasks been in your work?

Maria Hassabi For the piece I just did for the Winter Residencies this summer, the task was completely related to the solo. It was called Interactions—again playing with these words—and also the space. I decided to do the whole work on chairs. So it happened in a huge gymnasium. When I went there in February to set the piece, right away I decided I was going to do the whole work on the chairs. They're much bigger chairs than we have at the Kitchen. So the task was inherent in everything. I was going to make going down the stairs and across going up the stairs. With SHOFIC [with Hiroko], it was about this distance but we would never touch at the same time, we're touching all the time. Because we do know we're going to have the people around us, the idea of SHOFIC is that it needs the audience, otherwise there's no show. So it was about exaggerating that idea. And the distance that I tried to keep between us, that we tried to keep between us, was the distance I wanted with the people. And at the same time, the two-dimensionality, so you get to see us all the time. So there's no underlining.

Time Out New York Do you share the tasks?

Maria Hassabi No. With Robert and Maria, it's looking at each other in the eyes. With Sophie, it was the copying of all these images that I found of female women, and how you transfer from one image to the next within the physicality of motion, muscles, bones. And it goes further and further. It's easier when there are groups. Like with the happy piece. Or with the piece that I did with Jimmy in February I already knew that I was going to work with his material.

Time Out New York What was that?

Maria Hassabi The work was Counter-weight, and it consists of a specific number of wooden planks of different sizes. A three-minute Super 8 film is a set. So I had these three different elements to work with. And Jimmy, it becomes his self when it is. It's enough of a limitation.

Time Out New York How does the duet start?

Maria Hassabi I can't tell you. [Laughs] It's very simple, but I can't.

Time Out New York What have past tasks been in your work?

Maria Hassabi For the piece I just did for the Winter Residencies this summer, the task was completely related to the solo. It was called Interactions—again playing with these words—and also the space. I decided to do the whole work on chairs. So it happened in a huge gymnasium. When I went there in February to set the piece, right away I decided I was going to do the whole work on the chairs. They're much bigger chairs than we have at the Kitchen. So the task was inherent in everything. I was going to make going down the stairs and across going up the stairs. With SHOFIC [with Hiroko], it was about this distance but we would never touch at the same time, we're touching all the time. Because we do know we're going to have the people around us, the idea of SHOFIC is that it needs the audience, otherwise there's no show. So it was about exaggerating that idea. And the distance that I tried to keep between us, that we tried to keep between us, was the distance I wanted with the people. And at the same time, the two-dimensionality, so you get to see us all the time. So there's no underlining.

Time Out New York Do you share the tasks?

Maria Hassabi No. With Robert and Maria, it's looking at each other in the eyes. With Sophie, it was the copying of all these images that I found of female women, and how you transfer from one image to the next within the physicality of motion, muscles, bones. And it goes further and further. It's easier when there are groups. Like with the happy piece. Or with the piece that I did with Jimmy in February I already knew that I was going to work with his material.

Time Out New York What was that?